What is a Nurse Practitioner?

Nurse practitioners (NPs) are nationally certified, state-licensed, independent practitioners who practice in ambulatory, acute and long-term care as primary and/or specialty care providers. They provide nursing and medical services to individuals and families accordant with their practice specialties.

In addition to diagnosing and managing acute and chronic illnesses, NPs emphasize health promotion and disease prevention. More than 45 years of research consistently supports the excellent outcomes and high quality of care provided by NPs. Services include ordering, conducting, and interpreting diagnostic and laboratory tests, prescribing pharmacological agents and non-pharmacologic therapies, and teaching and counseling patients, among others.

As licensed, independent clinicians, NPs practice autonomously and in collaboration with health care professionals. They serve as health care researchers, interdisciplinary consultants and patient advocates.
